

Kenneth Bach
Chief Technology Officer

In September 2004, Kenneth Bach began his employment with the Office of Inspector General as the Technology Coordinator. Within a few months Mr. Bach was reassigned as the OIG's Chief Technology Officer (CTO). As the CTO, Mr. Bach is responsible for managing the OIG's Information Technology systems and serves as the primary point of contact for any technology issues that affect the OIG. Mr. Bach also provides guidance and advice to both the OIG's investigative and audit sections on Federal technology issues and policy.

Before assuming his role as CTO, Mr. Bach was employed by the Department of Interior's OIG, Program Integrity Division. Mr. Bach was responsible for leading a small investigative team focusing on senior Department of Interior employees accepting favors by lobbying groups and individuals. Mr. Bach was responsible for developing an automated system that could scan thousands of documents and then connect the information from these documents into a link analysis program that provided a timetable of events from which investigative leads could be developed.

Mr. Bach was born in Buffalo, New York. Mr. Bach is a recent graduate of the Federal Executive Institute, President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency, Leadership Development Academy, Charlotte, VA. He holds a Bachelor of Science Degree, in Criminal Justice and graduated Cum Laude from the University of Central Florida in 1998.
